

Is life after death
possible?

Matters are less clear when it comes to our other answers
to the survival question.

A large orange circle with a slight drop shadow, serving as a background for the text.

psychological survival: X is me just in case X stands in the right psychological connections to me

soul survival:

X is me just in case

X is the same

immaterial soul as

me

organism

survival: X is me
just in case X is the same organism as
me

combination

survival: X is me
just in case X is the combination of my soul and my body

brain survival: X
is me just in case X
is the same brain as
me

These views differ in important ways, but they all agree that your survival depends on the survival of a certain physical thing.

Views of this kind face an obvious problem in making sense of the possibility of life after death. After death bodies decay (or are cremated). Doesn't that just show that the relevant physical objects won't survive your death — and so that, if one of the above views is right, you won't?

This is a problem which has long troubled philosophers in the Christian tradition.

This might sound surprising. After all, don't Christians believe that one's immaterial soul is enough for life after death?

In fact, this is not the traditional Christian view. The following quote from Aquinas is representative:

“The necessity of holding the resurrection arises from this — that man may obtain the last end for which he was made. This cannot be accomplished in this life, nor in the life of the separated soul ... it is necessary for the selfsame man to rise again; and this is effected by the selfsame soul being united to the selfsame body. For otherwise there would be no resurrection properly speaking, if the same man were not reformed.”

This is also implied by the use of the word “resurrection”
— if life after death were simply the continued existence
of an immaterial soul, then there would be nothing needing to be “raised up.”

How can we make sense of this idea, given obvious facts about the decay of bodies and brains after death?

One idea (defended by Aquinas and others) is that at the time of resurrection our bodies could be reassembled by God. While it is true that our bodies decay after death, the material of which they were composed does not cease to exist. Surely an omnipotent being could then simply reassemble our bodies out of the matter from which they were composed when we were living.

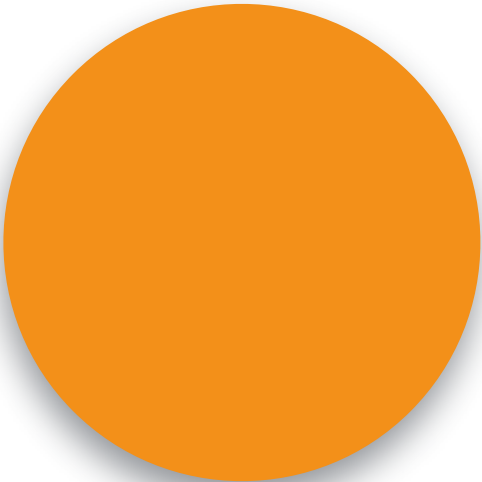

Would this be enough for God to bring our bodies back into existence?

to the survival question.

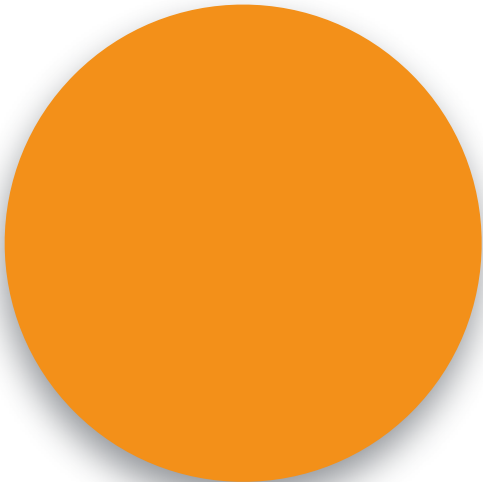

Matters are less clear when it comes to whether answers

These views differ in important ways, but they all agree that your survival depends on the survival of a certain physical things.

death $\rightarrow$ and so that, if one of the above views is right,

Views of this kind face an obvious problem in making you won't?

sense of the possibility of life after death. After death that the relevant physical objects won't survive your bodies decay (or are cremated). Doesn't that just show

This is a problem which has long troubled philosophers in

the christian tradition.

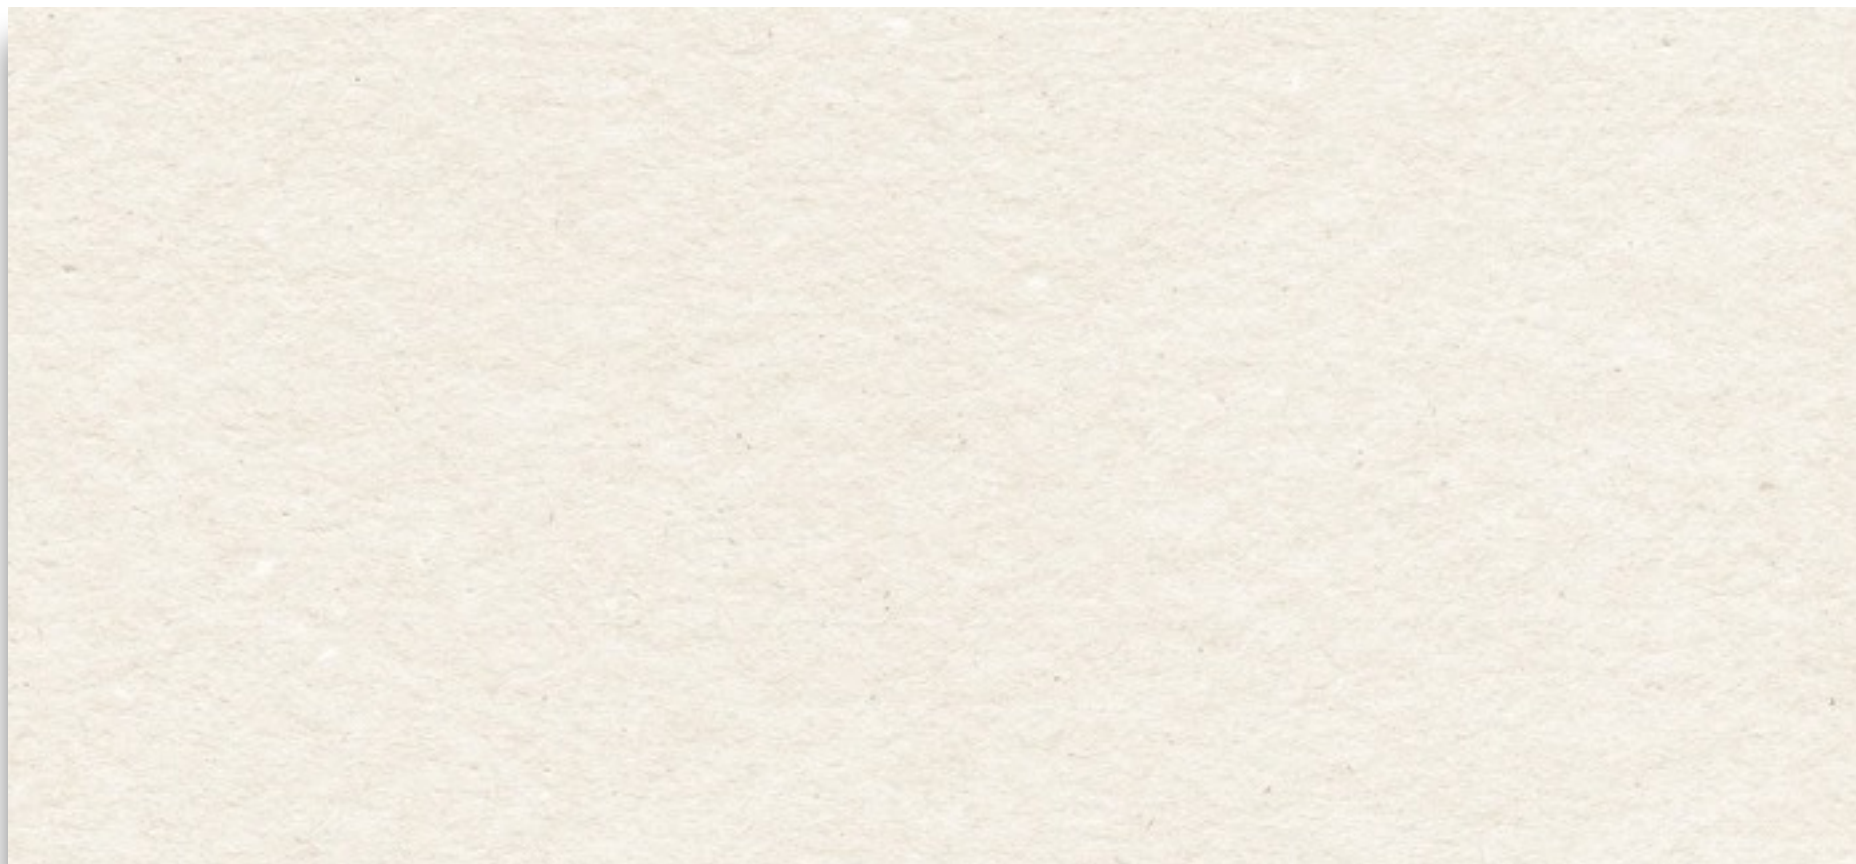

believe that one's immaterial soul is enough for life after

This might sound surprising. After all, don't Christians death?

In fact, this is not the traditional Christian view. The following quote from Aquinas is representative:

which was made. This card is placed in and this is effected by the sand being

'The necessity of holding their position arises from this — that may obtain the last end for united these 150 bodies. For the wise there would be no resistor properly speaking, in the

it is necessary for the soldier to rise again;

this life, not in the life after death.

Sandwiches are not refined."

of an immaterial soul, then there would be nothing

— if life after death were simply the continued existence

This is also implied by the use of the word "reaction"

needing to be 'raised up.'

about the decay of bodies and brains after death?

How can we make sense of this idea, given obvious facts to exist. Surely an omnipotent being could then simply

One idea (defended by Aquinas and others) is that at the time of resurrection our bodies could be reassembled by the material of which they were composed does not cease

God. While it is true that our bodies decay after death, were composed when we were living.

resemble our bodies out of the matter from which they

into existence?

Would this be enough for God to bring our bodies back

This idea is called into question by an ancient paradox: the paradox of the Ship of the newslus.