

If there is no life after death, is death a bad thing?

Is there life after death?

A large orange circle with a thin grey border, containing white text.

If life after death is possible, is it desirable?

When we were discussing the nature of persons, we discussed the question of whether life after death is possible. Life after death seems pretty clear possible on proponent of soul survival or psychological views; matters are trickier if materialism about persons is true, but even here there is room to believe in the possibility of life after death.

But of course even if life after death is possible, that doesn't tell us whether or not there is life after death. Let's turn to that question now.

There are a number of arguments for and against life after death that I'll mention only briefly and then set aside.

The first is what might be called the argument from religion. There are as many versions of this argument as there are religions; here is one

1. Christianity is true.

2. If Christianity is true, there is life after death.

C. There is life after death.

The second argument I am going to mention and then set aside is the argument from near death experiences.

Many people who come very close to death report similar kinds of experiences — a feeling of looking down at one's body, of feeling disembodied, of moving towards a light. One might argue from these experiences as follows:

1. People have near death experiences.
 2. If there were no life after death, people would not have near death experiences..
-

C. There is life after death.

Instead we will look at the main philosophical argument for life after death.

It is worth noting that this is an argument for life after death, but cannot in any obvious way (unlike the argument from religion) be turned into an argument for immortality.

The first argument has its origins in Plato's Phaedo. This is a dialogue which takes place between Socrates and his friends, after Socrates has been sentenced to death for corrupting the youth of Athens.

Socrates is unworried, explaining to his friends that death is nothing to be afraid of; death is just the death of the body, and not the death of him.

He gives a few arguments in favor of this view; the most influential is contained in the following passage.

"We ought," said Socrates, "to ask ourselves this: what sort of thing is it that would naturally suffer the fate of being dispersed? For what sort of thing should we fear this fate, and for what should we not? When we have answered this, we should next consider to which class the soul belongs; and then we shall know whether to feel confidence or fear about the fate of our souls."

"Quite true."

"Would you not expect a composite object or a natural compound to be liable to break up where it was put together? And ought not anything which is really incomposite be the one thing of all others which is not affected in this way?"

whether life after death is possible. Life after death seems pretty clear possible

When we're discussing the nature of persons, we discussed the question of materialism about persons is true, but even here there is room to believe in on prevention of soul survival or psychological views; matters are trickier if the possibility of life after death.

But of course even if life after death is possible, that doesn't tell us whether or not there is life after death. Let's turn to that question now.

mention only briefly and then set aside.

There are a number of arguments for and against life after death that I'll

The first is what might be called the argument from religion. There are as many versions of this argument as there are religions; here is one argument from near death experiences.

The second argument I am going to mention and then set aside is the towards a light. One might argue from the experience as follows:

Many people who have very close to death report similar kinds of experiences

—feeling looking down at one's body, feeling disembodied, moving existence of life after death, and then argue against it.

I am going to look at two philosophical arguments on this topic — one for the any other way (unlike the argument from religion) turned into an argument for immortality.

It is worth noting that this is an argument for life after death, but cannot in sentenced to death for corrupting the youth of Athens.

The first argument has its origin in Plato's Phaed. This is a dialogue which takes place between Socrates and his friends, after Socrates has been

So crated is unworried, explaining to his friends that death is nothing to be afraid of; death is just the death of the body, and not the death of him.

He gives a few arguments in favor of this view; the most influential is contained in the following passage:

He gives a few arguments in favor of this view; the most influential is

"We ought," said Socrates, "to ask ourselves this: what sort of thing is it that would naturally suffer the fate of being dispersed? For what sort of thing should we fear this fate, and for what should we not? When we have answered this, we should next consider to which class the soul belongs; and then we shall know whether to feel confidence or fear about the fate of our souls."

"Quite true."

"Would you not expect a composite object or a natural compound to be liable to break up where it was put together? And ought not anything which is really incomposite be the one thing of all others which is not affected in this way?"

sentenced to death for corrupting the youth of Athens.

The first argument has its origin in Plato's Phaed. This is a dialogue which takes place between Socrates and his friends, after Socrates has been

So crated is unworried, explaining to his friends that death is nothing to be afraid of; death is just the death of the body, and not the death of him.

"We ought," said Socrates, "to ask ourselves this: what sort of thing is it that would naturally suffer the fate of being dispersed? For what sort of thing should we fear this fate, and for what should we not? When we have answered this, we should next consider to which class the soul belongs; and then we shall know whether to feel confidence or fear about the fate of our souls."

"Quite true."

"Would you not expect a composite object or a natural compound to be liable to break up where it was put together? And ought not anything which is really incomposite be the one thing of all others which is not affected in this way?"