

What is justice?

This question breaks down into a number of sub-questions. We can nation — to be just.

ask what it means for a person to be just. We can also ask what it an individual society → which for our purposes we can take to be a

Today we are going to focus on the question of what it means for mean for an international system of distinct societies to be just.

justice, because it asks about the just distribution of goods within a society at a time.

This question is sometimes called the question of distributive

What goods are we talking about?

One category is what we might call material goods. These include things like food and property and income.

rights (such as the right to vote) and liberties (such as the freedom to choose where one lives or whom one marries or what job

But these are not the only goods. Other goods include political one pursues). As we will see, there are others.

to be unjust.

This is enough to describe a society which most of us would agree property, and gives members of group B only the are minimized in the ways that members of group A direct.

political rights and liberties (such as freedom of association and the relative quality. But at later time $t+1$, some sub-group A takes all of enslaved the members of group B, depriving them by force of their for survival. Members of group B are only permitted to serve group A

At some initial time t , the members of a society are living in a state of the property of subgroup B . Group A consolidates its power, and freedom to pursue an education). By time $t+2$, group A owns all the

It is universal that, at $t+2$, this is an unjust society.

The interesting question is: why is this? What would have to be different for this to be a just society? Different theories of justice provide different answers to this question.

inequality. On this view, a just society is one in which goods are

Our first theory of justice provides a very straightforward answer to this distributed equally. This view is egalitarianism.

question. On this view, what is unjust about our imagined society is its get the same food, just the same kind of residence, etc.

answer would be that everyone gets exactly the same goods. Everyone

What would it mean for goods to be distributed equally? A simple more spinach and less broccoli? And yet this would seem to be unjust on love and hate spin each, and you are the reverse. Wouldn't it be our simplest egalitarian view.

But if you think about it, this wouldn't be an ideal set-up. Suppose that better for me to get more brocoli and less spinach, and for you to get opportunity to buy goods. In a society like ours, this would mean that

The natural response to this on behalf of the egalitarian is to say that an equal distribution of goods need not mean that we each get exactly the same goods. Instead, perhaps we each should get exactly the same we would each get the same amount of money and the same income.

could then use this money on broccoli, and you could use it on spinach.

of goods unequal.

The fact that we made different choices would not make the distribution

A second problem for the egalitarian is the problem of how to handle inequalities that emerge over time.

might be very wasteful with my resources where a might be very amount of resources. Or maybe my house was destroyed by a tornado, Even if we specify that you and I get the same income at every period in clever with yours, so that after 20 years you have accumulated large and yours was not.

lives, we might still end up with very unequal distribution of goods.

unequal distribution of resources. This leads to a dilemma for the

It's like, at the end of this 20 year period, we might have a very there is an additional distribution of resources to restore equality?

egalitarian. Should we simply permit this kind of inequality, or should to rule out as unjust certain activities (like using one's resources wisely goods. But when we look at how this might work, we find that it seems

We seem to be at an impasse. The egalitarians start with the plausible to save up goods for one's self and one's children) which do not seem to be unjust.

idea that a just society would be one with an equal distribution of ignoring the way in which pain is distributed — which seems to

We then turned to utilitarianism, which ignores considerations of then we have a plausible argument that utilitarianism goes wrong in equality and instead just focused on the total happiness in a society. But push back in the direction of egalitarianism.

It is tempting to say that we need 'something in the middle.' Maybe so.

But even if so, what principled reasons could we have for deciding where?

children, whereas I give my children nothing. Then it looks like you children will have much greater res than mine from the start.

Obviously over a number of generations, the difference might become

The problem is exacerbated if we think about families. Suppose that you vest.

are clever with your resources and want to pass them along to your looks unjust, from egalitarian perspective.

different resources, even from the beginning of one's life? That Here the same kind of dilemma arises. Do we simply permit the vast allowing parents to pass along their values to their children? Many

Or do we instead consistently redistribute wealth, for example by not see this as an unacceptable restriction on one's freedom.

The egalitarian seemed forced to either permit it in a quality which it was the purpose of the view to avoid or adopt every strong redistributive principles which restrict freedom in the use of one's resources.