

What is justice?

This question breaks down into a number of sub-questions. We can ask what it means for a person to be just. We can also ask what it means for an international system of distinct societies to be just.

Today we are going to focus on the question of what it means for an individual society — which for our purposes we can take to be a nation — to be just.

This question is sometimes called the question of distributive justice, because it asks about the just distribution of goods within a society at a time.

What goods are we talking about?

One category is what we might call material goods. These include things like food and property and income.

But these are not the only goods. Other goods include political rights (such as the right to vote) and liberties (such as the freedom to choose where one lives or whom one marries or what job one pursues). As we will see, there are others.

This is enough to describe a society which most of us would agree to be unjust.

At some initial time t , the members of a society are living in a state of relative equality. But at a later time $t+1$, some sub-group A takes all of the property of sub-group B. Group A consolidates its power, and enslaves the members of group B, depriving them by force of their political rights and liberties (such as freedom of association and the freedom to pursue an education). By time $t+2$, group A owns all of the property, and gives members of group B only the minimum needed for survival. Members of group B are only permitted to serve group A in the ways that members of group A direct.

It is universal that, at $t+2$, this is an unjust society.

The interesting question is: why is this? What would have to be different for this to be a just society? Different theories of justice provide different answers to this question.

Our first theory of justice provides a very straightforward answer to this question. On this view, what is unjust about our imagined society is its inequality. On this view, a just society is one in which goods are distributed equally. This view is called egalitarianism.

What would it mean for goods to be distributed equally? A simple answer would be that everyone gets exactly the same goods. Everyone gets just the same food, just the same kind of residence, etc.

But if you think about it, this wouldn't be an ideal set-up. Suppose that I love broccoli and hate spinach, and you are the reverse. Wouldn't it be better for me to get more broccoli and less spinach, and for you to get more spinach and less broccoli? And yet this would seem to be unjust on our simple egalitarian view.

The natural response to this on behalf of the egalitarian is to say that an equal distribution of goods need not mean that we each get exactly the same goods. Instead, perhaps we each should get exactly the same opportunity to buy goods. In a society like ours, this would mean that we would each get the same amount of money and the same income. I could then use this money on broccoli, and you could use it on spinach. The fact that we made different choices would not make the distribution of goods unequal.

A second problem for the egalitarian is the problem of how to handle inequalities that emerge over time.

Even if we specify that you and I get the same income at every period in our lives, we might still end up with very unequal distributions of goods. I might be very wasteful with my resources whereas you might be very clever with yours, so that after 20 years you have accumulated a large amount of resources. Or maybe my house was destroyed by a tornado, and yours was not.

It looks like, at the end of this 20 year period, we might have a very unequal distribution of resources. This leads to a dilemma for the egalitarian. Should we simply permit this kind of inequality, or should there be an occasional redistribution of resources to restore equality?

The problem is exacerbated if we think about families. Suppose that you are clever with your resources and want to pass them along to your children, whereas I give my children nothing. Then it looks like your children will have much greater resources than mine from the start. Obviously over a number of generations, the difference might become vast.

Here the same kind of dilemma arises. Do we simply permit these vast differences in resources, even from the beginning of one's life? That looks unjust, from an egalitarian perspective.

Or do we instead consistently redistribute wealth, for example by not allowing parents to pass along their resources to their children? Many see this as an unacceptable restriction on one's freedom.

The egalitarian seems forced to either permit inequalities which it was the purpose of the view to avoid or adopt very strong redistributive principles which restrict freedom in the use of one's resources.

This might convince you that the egalitarian's goal of securing equality of goods across people is not, in the end, viable. Let's look at an alternative theory, which is in some ways the opposite of egalitarianism. This is utilitarianism: the view that the just society is the one which provides the greatest happiness to the greatest number of people.

Recall the version of egalitarianism on which goods are constantly being redistributed so as to ensure equality. The utilitarian will point out that this is likely to remove incentives to use one's goods productively. Suppose that you consider putting hard work into creating an invention which many people would enjoy. If you knew that the money you would earn from doing this would simply be redistributed to ensure equality, wouldn't that make you less likely to do it?

Here is an objection to utilitarianism:

The utilitarian thinks that the most just society is the one in which the most total goods are produced. For simplicity, we can imagine that this is the society with the highest total GDP. But it might be that the way of maximizing GDP would concentrate wealth in the hands of very few people, so that (for example) 5% of the population controlled almost all of the wealth, and most of the population lacks the income to afford basic goods like safe housing, a constant food source, and access to health care. No society like this could be just.

Today we are going to focus on the question of what it means for an individual society → which for our purposes we can take to be a nation — to be just.

mean for an international system of distinct societies to be just.

ask what it means for a person to be just. We can also ask what it

This question breaks down into a number of sub-questions. We can justice, because it asks about the just distribution of goods within

This question is sometimes called the question of distributive a society at a time.

things like food and property and income.

One category is what we might call material goods. These include

But these are not the only goods. Other goods include political freedom to choose where one lives or whom one marries or what job one pursues). As we will see, there are others.

rights (such as the right to vote) and liberties (such as the

This is enough to describe a society which most of us would agree

to be unjust.

At some initial time t , the members of a society are living in a state of relative equality. But at a later time $t+1$, some sub-group A takes all of the property of sub-group B. Group A consolidates its power, and enslaves the members of group B, depriving them by force of their political rights and liberties (such as freedom of association and the freedom to pursue an education). By time $t+2$, group A owns all of the property, and gives members of group B only the minimum needed for survival. Members of group B are only permitted to serve group A in the ways that members of group A direct.

It is controversial that, at $t+2$, this is an unjust society.

for this to be a just society? Different theories of justice provide different answers to this question.

The interesting question is: why is this? What would have to be different

Our first theory of justice provides a very straightforward answer to this inequality. On this view, a just society is one in which goods are question. On this view, what is unjust about our imagined society is its distributed equally. This view is egalitarianism.

answer would be that everyone gets exactly the same goods. Everyone get the same food, just the same kind of residence, etc.

What would it mean for goods to be distributed equally? A simple love and hate spin each, and you are the reverse. Wouldn't it be

But if you think about it, this wouldn't be an ideal set-up. Suppose that more spinach and less broccoli? And yet this would seem to be unjust on our simplest egalitarian view.

better for me to get more brocoli and less spinach, and for you to get an equal distribution of goods need not mean that we each get exactly of goods unequal.

The fact that we made different choices would not make the distribution opportunity to buy goods. In a society like ours, this would mean that the same goods. Instead, perhaps we each should get exactly the same could then use this money on broccoli, and you could use it on spinach.

The natural response to this on behalf of the egalitarian is to say that we would each get the same amount of money and the same income.

A second problem for the egalitarian is the problem of how to handle inequalities that emerge over time.

amount of resources. Or maybe my house was destroyed by a tornado, and yours was not.

Even if we specify that you and I get the same income at every period in lives, we might still end up with very unequal distribution of goods.

might be very wasteful with my resources where a might be very clever with yours, so that after 20 years you have accumulated large egalitarian. Should we simply permit this kind of inequality, or should

It's like, at the end of this 20 year period, we might have a very there a non-trivial distribution of resources to restore equality?

unequal distribution of resources. This leads to a dilemma for the children, whereas I give my children nothing. Then it looks like you

The problem is exacerbated if we think about families. Suppose that you children will have much greater res than mine from the start.

are clever with your resources and want to pass them along to your vest.

Obviously over a number of generations, the difference might become

Here the same kind of dilemma arises. Do we simply permit the vast looks unjust, from egalitarian perspective.

different resources, even from the beginning of one's life? That allowing parents to pass along their values to their children? Many

Or do we instead consistently redistribute wealth, for example by not see this as an unacceptable restriction on one's freedom.

the purpose of the view to avoid or adopt every strong redistributive principles which restrict freedom in the use of one's resources.

The egalitarian seemed forced to either permit it in a utilitarianism: the view that the just society is the one which provides the

This might convince you that the egalitarian's goal of securing equality of theory, which is in some ways the opposite of egalitarianism. This is greatest happiness to the greatest number of people.

good as people is not, in the end, viable. Let's look at an alternative redistributed so as to ensure equality. The utilitarian will point out that this is would enjoy. If you knew that the money would earn from doing this consider putting hardware into creating an invention which many people would simply be redistributed to ensure equality, wouldn't that make you Really the version of galitarianism on which gods are constantly being like y to do it?

likely to remove incentives to use one's goods productively. Suppose that you nothing unjust about someone using their own lab to create something of

But, the utilitarian says, we would all prefer to be in a society in which people benefit to all, and being rewarded for doing so. So we should reject any view had incentive to produce things which would benefit all. And there is of the just society — like galitarianism — which would rule this out.

The utilitarian thinks that the most just society is the one in which the most total goods are produced. For simplicity, we can imagine that this is the society with the highest total GDP. But it might be that the way of maximizing GDP would concentrate wealth in the hands of very few people, so that (for example) 5% of the population controlled almost all of the wealth, and most of the population lacks the income to afford basic goods like safe housing, a constant food source, and access to health care. No society like this could be just.

Here is an objection to utilitarianism:

The utilitarian thinks that the most just society is the one in which the most total goods are produced. For simplicity, we can imagine that this is the society with the highest total GDP. But it might be that the way of maximizing GDP would concentrate wealth in the hands of very few people, so that (for example) 5% of the population controlled almost all of the wealth, and most of the population lacks the income to afford basic goods like safe housing, a constant food source, and access to health care. No society like this could be just.