

What is justice?

This question breaks down into a number of sub-questions. We can ask what it means for a person to be just. We can also ask what it means for an international system of distinct societies to be just.

Today we are going to focus on the question of what it means for an individual society — which for our purposes we can take to be a nation — to be just.

This question is sometimes called the question of distributive justice, because it asks about the just distribution of goods within a society at a time.

What goods are we talking about?

One category is what we might call material goods. These include things like food and property and income.

But these are not the only goods. Other goods include political rights (such as the right to vote) and liberties (such as the freedom to choose where one lives or whom one marries or what job one pursues). As we will see, there are others.

This is enough to describe a society which most of us would agree to be unjust.

At some initial time t , the members of a society are living in a state of relative equality. But at a later time $t+1$, some sub-group A takes all of the property of sub-group B. Group A consolidates its power, and enslaves the members of group B, depriving them by force of their political rights and liberties (such as freedom of association and the freedom to pursue an education). By time $t+2$, group A owns all of the property, and gives members of group B only the minimum needed for survival. Members of group B are only permitted to serve group A in the ways that members of group A direct.

It is universal that, at $t+2$, this is an unjust society.

The interesting question is: why is this? What would have to be different for this to be a just society? Different theories of justice provide different answers to this question.

Our first theory of justice provides a very straightforward answer to this question. On this view, what is unjust about our imagined society is its inequality. On this view, a just society is one in which goods are distributed equally. This view is called egalitarianism.

What would it mean for goods to be distributed equally? A simple answer would be that everyone gets exactly the same goods. Everyone gets just the same food, just the same kind of residence, etc.

But if you think about it, this wouldn't be an ideal set-up. Suppose that I love broccoli and hate spinach, and you are the reverse. Wouldn't it be better for me to get more broccoli and less spinach, and for you to get more spinach and less broccoli? And yet this would seem to be unjust on our simple egalitarian view.

The natural response to this on behalf of the egalitarian is to say that an equal distribution of goods need not mean that we each get exactly the same goods. Instead, perhaps we each should get exactly the same opportunity to buy goods. In a society like ours, this would mean that we would each get the same amount of money and the same income. I could then use this money on broccoli, and you could use it on spinach. The fact that we made different choices would not make the distribution of goods unequal.

A second problem for the egalitarian is the problem of how to handle inequalities that emerge over time.

Even if we specify that you and I get the same income at every period in our lives, we might still end up with very unequal distributions of goods. I might be very wasteful with my resources whereas you might be very clever with yours, so that after 20 years you have accumulated a large amount of resources. Or maybe my house was destroyed by a tornado, and yours was not.

It looks like, at the end of this 20 year period, we might have a very unequal distribution of resources. This leads to a dilemma for the egalitarian. Should we simply permit this kind of inequality, or should there be an occasional redistribution of resources to restore equality?

One answer to this question is provided by the American philosopher John Rawls, who presented a framework for thinking about distributive justice. That framework begins with a kind of thought experiment.

Imagine that you were behind what Rawls called the veil of ignorance.

You are imagining a number of possible societies, where goods are distributed in a variety of ways. But you do not know which person in those societies you will be. You do not know whether your parents will be rich or poor. You do not know whether you will be born with a disease or not. You do not know whether you will be intelligent and good at various jobs, or not. You do not know whether you will be a man or a woman; you don't know whether you will be a member of a racial or religious minority or not. Rawls called this the original position.

Rawls then asked: if you were in this original position, what kind of society would you choose to be placed into (not knowing which person in that society you would be)?

We seem to be at an impasse. The egalitarian starts with the plausible idea that a just society would be one with an equal distribution of goods. But when we look at how this might work, we find that it seems to rule out as unjust certain activities (like using one's resources wisely to save up goods for oneself and one's children) which do not seem to be unjust.

We then turned to utilitarianism, which ignores considerations of equality and instead just focuses on the total happiness in a society. But then we saw a plausible argument that utilitarianism goes wrong in ignoring the way in which happiness is distributed — which seems to push us back in the direction of egalitarianism.

It is tempting to say that we need ‘something in the middle.’ Maybe so.

But even if so, what principled reason could we have for deciding where?

Our answer to this question, Rawls thought, will tell us what the just society would be. The just society is the one that we would choose if we did not know where in this society we would be.

This approach to thinking about justice is called contractualism. The idea is that the fairest society is the one we would choose if we eliminated knowledge of our position, thereby eliminating our self-interest in choosing a society which benefits our group over another group.

Contractualism is not itself a theory of justice — it is a way of arriving at a theory of justice. What society did Rawls think we would pick, if we were in the original position?

nation — to be just.

mean for an international system of distinct societies to be just.

an individual society → which for our purposes we can take to be a

Today we are going to focus on the question of what it means for

This question breaks down into a number of sub-questions. We can ask what it means for a person to be just. We can also ask what it a society at a time.

justice, because it asks about the just distribution of goods within

This question is sometimes called the question of distributive

One category is what we might call material goods. These include things like food and property and income.

freedom to choose where one lives or whom one marries or what job rights (such as the right to vote) and liberties (such as the one pursues). As we will see, there are others.

But these are not the only goods. Other goods include political

to be unjust.

This is enough to describe a society which most of us would agree

At some initial time t , the members of a society are living in a state of relative equality. But at a later time $t+1$, some sub-group A takes all of the property of sub-group B. Group A consolidates its power, and enslaves the members of group B, depriving them by force of their political rights and liberties (such as freedom of association and the freedom to pursue an education). By time $t+2$, group A owns all of the property, and gives members of group B only the minimum needed for survival. Members of group B are only permitted to serve group A in the ways that members of group A direct.

It is universal that, at $t+2$, this is an unjust society.

for this to be a just society? Different theories of justice provide different answers to this question.

The interesting question is: why is this? What would have to be different

Our first theory of justice provides a very straightforward answer to this inequality. On this view, a just society is one in which goods are distributed equally. This view is egalitarianism.

question. On this view, what is unjust about our imagined society is its answer would be that everyone gets exactly the same goods. Everyone get the same food, just the same kind of residence, etc.

What would it mean for goods to be distributed equally? A simple

But if you think about it, this wouldn't be an ideal set-up. Suppose that more spin and less broccoli? And yet this would seem to be unjust on our simplest egalitarian view.

better for me to get more brocoli and less spinach, and for you to get love and hate spin each, and you are the reverse. Wouldn't it be the same goods. Instead, perhaps we each should get exactly the same an equal distribution of goods need not mean that we each get exactly

The fact that we made different choices would not make the distribution opportunity to buy goods. In a society like ours, this would mean that of goods unequal.

we would each get the same amount of money and the same income.

The natural response to this on behalf of the egalitarian is to say that could then use this money on broccoli, and you could use it on spinach.

inequalities that emerge over time.

A second problem for the egalitarian is the problem of how to handle lives, we might still end up with very unequal distribution of goods.

amount of resources. Or maybe my house was destroyed by a tornado, might be very wasteful with my resources where a might be very

and yours was not.

Even if we specify that you and I get the same income at every period in clever with yours, so that after 20 years you have accumulated large

It's like, at the end of this 20 year period, we might have a very unequal distribution of resources. This leads to a dilemma for the

there is an additional distribution of resources to restore equality?

egalitarian. Should we simply permit this kind of inequality, or should

John Rawls, who presented a framework for thinking about distributive

One answer to this question is provided by the American philosopher justice. That framework begins with a kind of thought experiment.

those societies you will be. You do not know whether your parents will position.

disaster or not. You do not know whether you will be intelligent and man or a woman; you don't know whether you will be a member of a be rich or poor. You do not know where you will be born with a

You're imagining a number of possible cities, where goods are good at various jobs, or not. You do not know whether you will be a distributed in a variety of ways. But you don't know which person in racially religious minority not. Racial this the original Imagine that you were behind what Ravi called the veil of ignorance.

in that society you would be)?

society would you choose to be placed into (not knowing which person

Rawls then asked: if you were in this original position, what kind of

We seem to be at an impasse. The egalitarians start with the plausible to rule out as unjust certain activities (like using one's resources wisely to save up goods for one's self and one's children) which do not seem to goods. But when we look at how this might work, we find that it seems idea that a just society would be one with an equal distribution of

be unjust.

We then turned to utilitarianism, which ignores considerations of then we have a plausible argument that utilitarianism goes wrong in ignoring the way in which pain is distributed — which seems to equality and instead just focused on the total happiness in a society. But push back in the direction of egalitarianism.

But even if so, what principled reasons could we have for deciding where?

It is tempting to say that we need 'something in the middle.' Maybe so.

Our answer to this question, Rawls thought, will tell us what the just society would be. The just society is the one that we would choose if we did not know where in this society we would be.

interest in choosing a society which benefits our group over another eliminated knowledge of our position, thereby eliminating our self-idea is that the fairest society is the one we would choose if we group.

This approach to thinking about justice is called contractualism. The Contractualism is not itself a theory of justice—it is a way of arriving at the end of justice. What society did Rawls think we would pick, if we where in the original position?