

What is justice?

This question breaks down into a number of sub-questions. We can ask what it means for a person to be just. We can also ask what it means for an international system of distinct societies to be just.

Today we are going to focus on the question of what it means for an individual society — which for our purposes we can take to be a nation — to be just.

This question is sometimes called the question of distributive justice, because it asks about the just distribution of goods within a society at a time.

What goods are we talking about?

One category is what we might call material goods. These include things like food and property and income.

But these are not the only goods. Other goods include political rights (such as the right to vote) and liberties (such as the freedom to choose where one lives or whom one marries or what job one pursues). As we will see, there are others.

This is enough to describe a society which most of us would agree to be unjust.

At some initial time t , the members of a society are living in a state of relative equality. But at a later time $t+1$, some sub-group A takes all of the property of sub-group B. Group A consolidates its power, and enslaves the members of group B, depriving them by force of their political rights and liberties (such as freedom of association and the freedom to pursue an education). By time $t+2$, group A owns all of the property, and gives members of group B only the minimum needed for survival. Members of group B are only permitted to serve group A in the ways that members of group A direct.

It is universal that, at $t+2$, this is an unjust society.

Our first theory of justice provides a very straightforward answer to this question. On this view, what makes a society unjust is inequality. On this view, a just society is one in which goods are distributed equally.

This view is called egalitarianism.

What would it mean for goods to be distributed equally? A simple answer would be that everyone gets exactly the same goods. Everyone gets just the same food, just the same kind of residence, etc.

But if you think about it, this wouldn't be an ideal set-up. Suppose that I love broccoli and hate spinach, and you are the reverse. Wouldn't it be better for me to get more broccoli and less spinach, and for you to get more spinach and less broccoli? And yet this would seem to be unjust on our simple egalitarian view.

an individual society → which for our purposes we can take to be a

This question breaks down into a number of sub-questions. We can ask what it means for a person to be just. We can also ask what it mean for an international system of distinct societies to be just.

Today we are going to focus on the question of what it means for nation -- to be just.

justice, because it asks about the just distribution of goods within

This question is sometimes called the question of distributive a society at a time.

things like food and property and income.

One category is what we might call material goods. These include one pursues). As we will see, there are others.

freedom to choose where one lives or whom one marries or what job rights (such as the right to vote) and liberties (such as the

But these are not the only goods. Other goods include political

to be unjust.

This is enough to describe a society which most of us would agree

At some initial time t , the members of a society are living in a state of relative equality. But at a later time $t+1$, some sub-group A takes all of the property of sub-group B. Group A consolidates its power, and enslaves the members of group B, depriving them by force of their political rights and liberties (such as freedom of association and the freedom to pursue an education). By time $t+2$, group A owns all of the property, and gives members of group B only the minimum needed for survival. Members of group B are only permitted to serve group A in the ways that members of group A direct.

It is universal that, at $t+2$, this is an unjust society.

Our first theory of justice provides a very straightforward answer to this question. On this view, what makes a society unjust is inequality. On this view, a just society is one in which goods are distributed equally.

This view is called egalitarianism.

The interesting question is: why is this? What would have to be different answers to this question.

for this to be a just society? Different theories of justice provide different

Our first theory of justice provides a very straightforward answer to this inequality. On this view, a just society is one in which goods are question. On this view, what is unjust about our imagined society is its distributed equally. This view is egalitarianism.

get the same food, just the same kind of residence, etc.

answer would be that everyone gets exactly the same goods. Everyone

What would it mean for goods to be distributed equally? A simple

I've broccoli and hate spinach, and you are the reverse. Wouldn't it be better for me to get more brocoli and less spinach, and for you to get

our simplest egalitarian view.

But if you think about it, this wouldn't be an ideal set-up. Suppose that more painful and less broad? And yet this would seem to be unjust on

get the same food, just the same kind of residence, etc.

answer would be that everyone gets exactly the same goods. Everyone

What would it mean for goods to be distributed equally? A simple

Love and hate spin each, and you are the reverse. Wouldn't it be better for me to get more brocoli and less spinach, and for you to get

our simplest egalitarian view.

But if you think about it, this wouldn't be an ideal set-up. Suppose that more spinach and less broccoli? And yet this would seem to be unjust on