

certain actions
are right or wrong

certain
outcomes or situations are better or worse
than others

A solid green circle with a subtle drop shadow, centered on a white background. Inside the circle, the text "certain people or lives are better or worse than others" is written in a white, sans-serif font, arranged in five lines.

certain
people or lives
are better or worse than
others

The consequentialist takes the goodness or badness of situations as fundamental, and tries to explain the others in terms of these. What would it look like if we took one of the other categories as most fundamental?

A deontological approach to what we ought to do takes facts about the rightness and wrongness of actions as basic, and does not try to explain the rightness or wrongness of actions in terms of the goodness or badness of the action's outcomes.

There are lots of different deontological theories. I'm going to briefly introduce you to one, which is based on the idea that people have certain basic rights. On this view, wrong actions are actions which violate someone's rights.

But what are our rights, and which actions violate them?

certain actions
are right or wrong

certain
outcomes or situations are
better or worse
than others

certain
people or lives
are better or
worse than
others

categories as most fundamental?

The sequentialist takes the goodness or badness of situations as fundamental, and tries to explain them in terms of these. What would it look like if we took one of the other actions in terms of the goodness or badness of the action's outcomes.

And don't logi cal approach what we ought to do as facts about the right and

wrongness of actions as basic, and does not try to explain the rightness or wrongness of

There are lots of different deontological theories. I'm going to briefly introduce you to one, which is based on the idea that people have certain basic rights. On this view, wrong actions are actions which violate one's rights.

certain actions
are right or
wrong

categories as most fundamental?

The sequentialist takes the goodness or badness of situations as fundamental, and tries to explain the others in terms of these. What would it look like if we took one of the others actions in terms of the goodness or badness of the action's outcomes.

And ontological approach to what we ought to do takes facts about the rights and

wrongness of actions as basic, and does not try to explain the rightness or wrongness of

There are lots of different deontological theories. I'm going to briefly introduce you to one, which is based on the idea that people have certain basic rights. On this view, wrong

actions are actions which violate one's rights.

But what are rights, and which actions violate them?