

Recall that we presented Utilitarianism as the combination of hedonism with consequentialism.

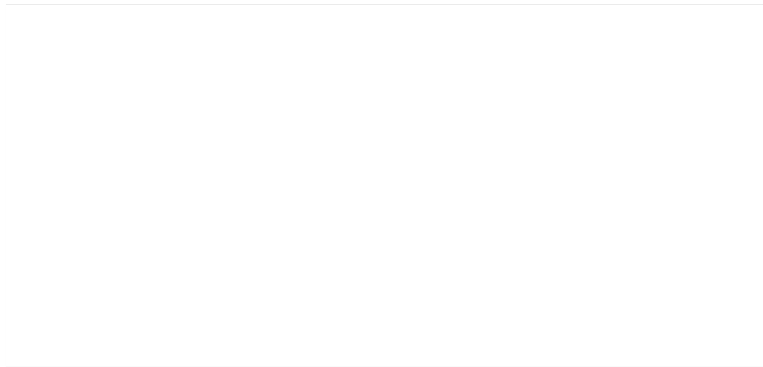

You might think that the experience machine is a problem for hedonism, but not for consequentialism as such. Couldn't the consequentialist just say that there are goods besides pleasure, and bads besides pain?

The extent to which
the states of affairs
contain beauty, or
love, or friendship,
or something else
taken to be of objective value.

Corresponding to each of these views about the good is a different version of consequentialism. For example, the first would yield the result that one should always act in such a way that maximizes the number of desires of people which are satisfied.

The extent to which the desires of agents are satisfied.

The extent to which
the states of affairs
maximize the well-being, or welfare, of agents.

Here are some other candidates for goods:

What would that view say about the experience machine?

consequentialism.

Realists that we presented militarism as the combination of hedonism with

You might think that the experience machine is a problem for hedonism, but not for please, and besides pain?

consequentialism as such. Couldn't the consequentialist just say that there are gods besides this states if air is containing beauty, or the other side

The entire world

objectively available.

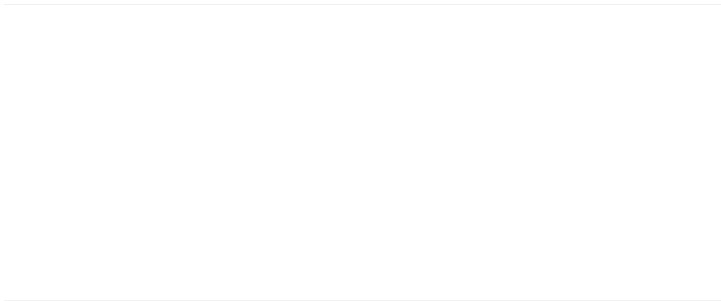

or something else

love, friendship,

Corresponding to each of these views about the good is a different version of consequentialism. For example, the first would yield the result that one should always act in such a way that maximize the number of desires of people which are satisfied.

agets

are

The extent within the desired iris of

is in id.

the states of affairs

The extent of which

being, or we'll be, or if

maximize the welfare

agrits.