

This sort of thought also promises to make sense of the example of David the surgeon; perhaps healthy specimens have a right not to be cut up, but that dying patients in need of transplants have no right to be saved.

This way of thinking about these cases is very different than the way of approaching them suggested by Consequentialism. According to this view, we should think about what we ought to do by first thinking about the rights and obligations of the people involved and not, at least in the first instance, about which action would bring about the best outcome.

One thought is this: the fat man has a right not to be pushed onto the tracks in a way that people standing on trolley tracks don't have a right not to be run over by trolleys.

If you think we should go in some direction of this kind, you should think about how best to reply to the simple but strong arguments for consequentialism with which we began.

A solid blue circle is centered on a white background. Inside the circle, the text "certain actions are right or wrong" is written in a white, sans-serif font, arranged in three lines.
