

Is Nazik right that the consequences of utilitarianism are incorrect?

What must the utilitarian say about the relative goodness of the state of affairs in which everyone (or almost everyone) plugs in and the state of affairs in which no one does?

Suppose you face the decision whether to get into the experience machine. What would a utilitarian say about what you ought to do?

Suppose now that you face the decision of whether you should put everyone into the experience machine. (The machines are maintained by extremely reliable robots.) What would a utilitarian say about what you ought to do?

Does it matter if people ask you (or beg you) not to plug them in?

affairs in which none does?

What must the utilitarian say about the relative goodness of the state of affairs in which everyone (or almost everyone) plugs in and the state of Support your face the decision whether to get into the experience machine. What would a utilitarian say about what you ought to do?

experience machine. (The machines are maintained by extremely reliable robots.) What Suppose now that you face the decision of whether you should put everyone into the

would a utilitarian say about what you ought to do?