

Last time we talked about the question of whether there are any facts about what is right and wrong or what is good and bad.

to explain the others in terms of these. What would it look like if we took one of the others

The sequentialist takes the goodness or badness of situations as fundamental, and tries categories as most fundamental?

wrongness of actions as basic, and does not try to explain the rightness or wrongness of actions in terms of the goodness or badness of the action's outcomes.

And ontological approach to what we ought to do takes facts about the rights and

There are lots of different deontological theories. I'm going to briefly introduce you to one, actions are actions which violate one's rights.

which is based on the idea that people have certain basic rights. On this view, wrong

But what are rights, and which actions violate them?

centuryGerman philosopher Immanuel Kant.

One answer to this question was given by the 18th

Kant thought that all human beings have dignity, and that this means that we all have the right not to be used as a way to satisfy the desires of others.

The second is that there are plenty of cases where there seems to be a one is treating anyone else as a mere means. Let's consider three examples of this.

morale obligation to do something, even though, either way, no

These are cases of simple disregard. Suppose that I drive very that used the child as a means to an end; but this was surely wrong.

quickly out of my neighborhood and run over a child. It does not seem actions involve treating not as mere means, but seemingly wrong.

Consider, for example, animal cruelty or environmental destruction. These

The first are cases which involve no actions toward other human beings.

Our three approaches to thinking about the topic can be distinguished by how think about the relationships between these facts.