

certain actions
are right or wrong

A solid red circle with a subtle drop shadow, centered on a white background. Inside the circle, the text "certain outcomes or situations are better or worse than others" is written in a white, sans-serif font, arranged in five lines.

certain
outcomes or situations are better or worse
than others

A solid green circle with a subtle drop shadow, centered on a white background. Inside the circle, the text "certain people or lives are better or worse than others" is written in a white, sans-serif font, arranged in five lines.

certain
people or lives
are better or worse than
others

The consequentialist takes the goodness or badness of situations as fundamental, and tries to explain the others in terms of these. What would it look like if we took one of the other categories as most fundamental?

A deontological approach to what we ought to do takes facts about the rightness and wrongness of actions as basic, and does not try to explain the rightness or wrongness of actions in terms of the goodness or badness of the action's outcomes.

There are lots of different deontological theories. I'm going to briefly introduce you to one, which is based on the idea that people have certain basic rights. On this view, wrong actions are actions which violate someone's rights.

One answer to this question was given by the 18th century German philosopher Immanuel Kant.

Kant thought that all human beings have dignity, and that this means that we all have the right not to be used as a way to satisfy the desires of others.

He called this view 'the law of humanity':

‘Act in such a way that you always treat humanity,
whether in your own person or the person of any other, never simply as a means, but always at the same time as an end.’

certain actions
are right or
wrong

certain actions
are right or
wrong

certain
outcomes or situations are
better or worse
than others

certain
people or lives
are better or
worse than
others

categories as most fundamental?

to explain the others in terms of these. What would it look like if we took one of the others

The sequentialist takes the goodness or badness of situations as fundamental, and tries actions in terms of the goodness or badness of the action's outcomes.

And ontological approach to what we ought to do takes facts about the rights and wrongness of actions as basic, and does not try to explain the rightness or wrongness of actions are actions which violate one's rights.

which is based on the idea that people have certain basic rights. On this view, wrong

One answer to this question was given by the 18th centuryGerman philosopher Immanuel Kant.

Kant thought that all human beings have dignity, and used as a way to satisfy the desires of others.

that this means that we all have the right not to be

‘Act in such a way that you always treat humanity,
whether in your own person or the person of any other, never simply as a means, but always at the same time as an end.’

He called this view 'the law of humanity':