

moral realism

moral nihilism

moral relativism

The emotivist might reply by saying that moral terms mean different things when they occur in the “if” parts of “if-then” sentences.

But this view faces an immediate problem. Consider the following argument:

1. If killing is wrong, then convincing
someone to kill is wrong.

2. Killing is wrong.

C. Convincing someone to kill is wrong. (1,2)

This argument seems to be valid. But how could it be valid, if “wrong” meant something different in the “if” part of premise (1) than it does in premise (2)?

The motivist might reply by saying that moral terms

'if-then's' sentences.

ment and different things when they are in the “if” parts of

following argument:

But this view faces an immediate problem. Consider the

1. If killing is wrong, then convincing someone to kill is wrong.
2. Killing is wrong.

C. Convincing someone to kill is wrong. (1,2)

premise (1) than it does in premise (2)?

if “wrong” meant something different in the “if” part of

This argument seems to be valid. But how could it be valid,