

A large red circle with a slight drop shadow, containing the text "moral realism" in white.

moral
realism

moral
nihilism

moral relativism

There are two main things to say about this line of argument.

First: to be a moral realist is to believe that there are objective moral facts; it is not to believe that one knows what they are. You might be a moral realist and be completely agnostic about whether your moral code, or that of some other culture, is the correct one.

Compare: you might believe that there is an objective truth about what is being served in the dining hall tonight, and yet be completely unsure about whether you or your roommate is more likely to guess correctly what it will be.

There are two main things to say about this line of argument.

First: a moral realist is to believe that there are objective

You might be a moral realist and be completely agnostic about moral facts; it is not believe that one knows what they are.

whether your moral code, or that of someone else, is the about what is being served in the dining hall tonight, and yet be likely to guess correctly what it will be.

completely unsure about whether you're right or wrong is more

Compare: you might believe that there is an objective truth