

moral realism

moral nihilism

moral relativism

Not all meaningful uses of language are attempts to describe facts. Here are some examples:

“Get out of my classroom!”

“I declare you husband
and wife.”

‘‘Boooo!’’ (directed at referees from the Atlantic Coast Conference)

One might have the view that moral language is like this: it is meaningful, but not an attempt to describe facts about the world. This view is called emotivism.

Emotivism is an attractive position for the moral nihilist, who can then explain why our uses of moral language seem to make sense despite the fact that there are no facts about what is right and wrong.

Because of problems like this, many moral nihilists are not error theorists. An alternative form of moral nihilism says that moral sentences are not trying and failing to describe moral facts — rather, they aren't attempts to describe facts at all.

describe facts. Here are some examples:

Not all meaningful uses of language are attempts to Canals in London!

“Get it off my

vidi videri

‘I declare you husband

'Boo!!' (directed at reefs from

the Atlantic Coast Conference)

why use of moral language seem to make sense despite the fact that there

Enthusiasm is an attractive position for the moral nihilist, who can then explain

One might have the view that moral language is like this: it is meaningful, but not an attempt to describe facts about the world. This view is called emotivism.

are no facts about what is right and wrong.

Because of problems like this, many moral nihilists are says that moral sentences are not trying and failing to describ moral facts — rather, they aren't attempts to not the first. Alternative for nihilism describe facts at all.