

moral realism

moral nihilism

moral relativism

1. If killing is wrong, then convincing
someone to kill is wrong.

2. Killing is wrong.

C. Convincing someone to kill is wrong. (1,2)

This argument seems to be valid. But how could it be valid, if “wrong” meant something different in the “if” part of premise (1) than it does in premise (2)?

Compare the following argument:

1. I keep my money in the bank.

2. I sometimes go fishing on the bank.

C. I sometimes go fishing where I keep my money.

(1,2)

On the natural interpretation that “bank” has different meanings in (1) and (2), this is invalid. The emotivist who thinks that “wrong” means different things in different sentences must explain why this is not also true of the argument about killing.

some one to kill is wrong.

2. Killing is wrong.

Convincing someone to kill is wrong. (1,2)

1. If killing is wrong, then dividing

This argument seems to be valid. But how could it be valid, if “wrong” meant something different in the “if” part of premise (1) than it does in premise (2)?

C. I sometimes go fishing where I keep my money.

1. I keep my money in the bank.

2. I sometimes go fishing on the bank.

(1, 2)

mean different things in different sentences must explain why this is not also true of the argument about killing.

On the natural interpretation that ‘bank’ has different meanings in

(1) and (2), this is invalid. The emotivist who thinks that ‘wrong’