

moral realism

moral
nihilism

moral relativism

Here is a second argument for emotivism. Many have thought that something like the following principle is plausible:

But this can seem puzzling. If when we say that something is good we are just describing some fact, why should it be impossible to do this sincerely while lacking any motivation to pursue the thing? One can, e.g., sincerely say that something has a certain shape or color without having any motivation to pursue it.

It looks like the emotivist can give an explanation of why the Good-Motivation Connection holds. If when we use moral language we are expressing a preference or feeling, judging that something is good just is expressing some preference for that thing, and hence some motivation to pursue it.

The Good-Motivation Connection

If someone sincerely judges that X is good, they must have some motivation to pursue X.

something like the following principle is plausible:

Here is a second argument for emotivism. Many have thought that e.g., sincerely say that something has a certain shape or color without

But this can seem puzzling. If we say that something is good we sincerely while lacking any motivation to pursue the thing? One can, are just describing the fact, why should it be impossible to do this having any motivation to pursue it.

just expressing one preference for that thing, and hence some Motivation Connection holds. If we use moral language we are

It looks like the empiricist can give an explanation of why the God-expressing a preference or feeling, judging that something is good motivation to pursue it.

good, they must have some motivation to

If someone sincerely judges that X is

The Good-Motivation Connection

Divide $\times$.