

moral
realism

moral
nihilism

moral relativism

On either interpretation, the emotivist might reasonably claim to have an advantage over the relativist in explaining what's going on in cases of moral disagreement. According to the emotivist, it is like one of the following kinds of disagreement:

“Study hard tonight!”

“Don’t study hard tonight, watch TV instead!”

‘‘Boo, Notre Dame!’’

‘‘Yay, Notre Dame!’’

Both seem like genuine varieties of disagreement — but
neither is disagreement about the facts.

This means that disagreements about morality are not factual disagreements. Is this plausible?

explaining what's going on in cases of moral claim to have an advantage over the relativist in the following kinds of disagreement:

disagreement. According to the activist, it is like one of

On this interpretation, the emotivist might reasonably

'Study hard tonight!'

‘Don’t study hard tonight, watch TV instead!’

'Yay, Notre Dame!!',

‘Boo, Notre Dame!’

Both seem like genuine varieties of disagreement — but

neither is disagreement about the facts.

This means that disagreements about morality are not factually disagreements. Is this plausible?