

moral realism

moral nihilism

moral relativism

But if there are no moral facts, what are we doing when we go around saying that certain things are good or bad?

The simplest view that the moral nihilism might take is that we are simply making a mistake: we are making claims about something which does not in fact exist.

“Santa Claus will bring me an Elmo doll this year.”

It seems clear that she is trying to describe the world: she is saying something about how she takes the world to be. It's just that what she is saying is false, since there is no Santa Claus.

We are familiar with other cases of this sort. Consider, for example, my daughter's utterance of

But if there are no moral facts, what

are we doing when we go around

saying that certain things are good or

bad?

are simply making mistakes: we are making claims about something which does not in fact exist.

The simplest view that the moral nihilist might take is that we chris yes sir ; ;

'Saint Claus will bring me an Elm do!

she takes the world to be. It's just that what she is saying is false, since there is no Santa

It seems clear that she is trying to describe the world: she is saying something about how Clarus.

daughter's utterance of

We are familiar with other cases of this sort. Consider, for example, my

she takes the world to be. It's just that what she is saying is false, since there is no Santa

It seems clear that she is trying to describe the world: she is saying something about how

Chaus.