

Last class we introduced the conservative idea that you should stick with your existing beliefs unless you encounter a good argument against them.

Our first topic today is a challenge to this idea. It is an attempt to show that certain situations can provide us good reason to abandon our beliefs despite their not providing any argument (at least directly) for their falsity. These are situations of disagreement.

Let's start with an example which seems to show that we should modify our views in response to certain kinds of disagreement.

Last class we introduced the conservative idea that you should stick with your existing beliefs unless you encounter good arguments against them.

Our first topic today is a challenge to this idea. It is an attempt to show that situations of disagreement.

certain situations can provide us good reason to abandon our beliefs despite their not providing any argument (at least directly) for their falsity. These are

Let's start with an example which seems to show that we should modify our

views in response to certain kinds of disagreement.

Let's start with an example which seems to show that we should modify our

views in response to certain kinds of disagreement.