

the basic
idea

does free
will explain
any evil?

A large orange circle with a slight drop shadow, containing the text "does free will explain all evil?" in white, lowercase, sans-serif font.

does free
will explain
all evil?

1. Some instance of rape, torture, murder, or child abuse is a great evil
 2. There is no good which outweighs this event and which is such that an omnipotent being could not have brought about the good without the tsunami.
 3. A perfectly good being would eliminate every evil unless there was a good which outweighed that evil and it was impossible for that being to eliminate the evil without eliminating the good.
 4. There is no omnipotent and perfectly good being. (1,2,3)
 5. If there is no omnipotent and perfectly good being, God does not exist.
-

C. God does not exist. (4,5)

“Traditional free-will approaches - with their move to shift responsibility and/or blame for evil away from God and onto personal creatures - are stalemated by horrendous evil. Human radical vulnerability to horrors cannot have its origin in misused created freedom, because - even if one accepted the story of Adam’s fall as historical (which I do not) - the way it is told, humans were radically vulnerable to horrors from the beginning, even in Eden. The framework within which the primal ancestors made their choices was such that obedient choices meant persistence of the status quo, while disobedient choices would result in the horrendous disarray such as humans have experienced ever since. Even if Adam’s and Eve’s choices are supposed to be somehow self-determined, the fact that the consequences amplify far beyond their capacity to conceive and hence to intend - viz., to horrors of which ex hypothesi they had no prior experience and of which they could therefore have no adequate conception - is not something for which humans are responsible. Rather it is a function of the interaction between human agency and the wider framework within which it is set, and God is responsible for creating human beings in such a framework!”

Surely many events such as these occurred before human beings were on the scene; and surely at least some animal suffering of this kind is an evil.

This gives us the resources to construct a new argument:

The argument from horrific evils

We have now laid out three arguments based, not on the existence of some evil in the world, but based on the existence of particular evils: the evil caused by natural disasters, the evil of pre-human suffering, and especially horrific evils.

3. A perfectly good being would eliminate every evil unless there was a good which outweighed that evil and it was impossible for that being to eliminate the evil without eliminating the good.

Each of these arguments relies on the following premise:

One argument against (3) uses the example of a prison sentence. Suppose that someone is justly convicted of a crime, and sentenced to 10 years in prison. Suppose further that this sentence is just.

Now suppose that you are given the chance to reduce the sentence by 1 day. If the above principle is true, it looks like you should.

But suppose we keep giving you this opportunity. Using the above principle, you will keep reducing the sentence, until it is 0 days in length.

But that seems like the wrong result. Is this a successful reductio of premise (3) of these arguments?

Let's now look at premise (2). One way to object to an instance of (2) is to point to a good which outweighs the evil and which is such that even God could not have brought about the good without the evil. That's the approach taken by the free will defense.

But that is not the only kind of objection one can make to premise (2) of these arguments. One might also say that, despite the fact that we do not know what good outweighs the evil, we have no particular reason to think that there is not such a good, and hence have no particular reason to think that (2) is true.

2. There is no good which outweighs this event and which is such that an omnipotent being could not have brought about the good without the evil.

greatenvi

Some instances of rape, torture, murder, or child abuse is a

3. Perfectly good being would eliminate every evil eliminating the good.

impossible for that being to eliminate the evil without about the good without the strain.

5 If there is no merit and perfectly good being, God such that an important being does not have enough

2. There is no good without weight and which is there was a good weight and it was

4. There is no omnipotent and perfectly good being. (1, 2, 3)

c. God does not exist. (4,5)

does not exist.

beings were on the scene; and surely at least some animal suffering of this kind is evil.

Surely many events such as the current before human

We have now laid out three arguments based, not on the existence evils: the evil caused by natural disasters, the evil of pre-human of some evil in the world, but based on the existence of particular suffering, and especially horrific evils.

eliminate every evil wherever

3. Perfectly good being world

evil and it was impossible for that was a good night weigh in that

eliminating the good.

being to eliminate the evil without that someone is justly convicted of a crime, and sentenced to 10 years in

One argument against (3) uses the example of a prison sentence. Suppose prison. Suppose further that this sentence is just.

Now suppose that you are given the chance to reduce the sentence by 1 day. If the above principle is true, it should.

will keep reducing the sentence, until it is 0 days in length.

But since we keep giving you this opportunity, using the principle,

But that seems like the wrong result. Is this a successful reduction of premise (3) of these arguments?

to print a good which outweigh the evil and which is such that even God could not have brought about the good without the evil. That's Let's now look at premise (2). One way to object to an instance of (2) is the approach taken by the free will defense.

know what good outweighs the evil, we have no particular reason to think these arguments. One might also say that, despite the fact that we do not

But that is not the only kind of objection we can make to premise (2) of that there is not such a god, and hence have no particular reason to think that(2) is true.

outweighs this event and

Qvili

2. There is no good which

which is which that at all not have brought about

onipotent being child

the good with the

Free will cannot explain any evil.

Free will can explain some evil; but it can't explain all of the evil we find in the world.

does free
will explain
any evil?

A large orange circle with a subtle drop shadow, containing the text "does free will explain all evil?" in white, bold, sans-serif font.

does free
will explain
all evil?

the basic
idea

does free
will explain
any evil?

there could be evil in a world with a omnipotent and perfectly good

God. It can explain that, it seems, if we make the following assumption:

Summing up so far: we have seen that Frege will promise to explain how

there are possible situations which an omnipotent
being cannot bring about

we have
free will

free will is a great good

the ability to harm others
is a great good

is such that an input outweighs this event and which being or would not have brought about the good with that the

2. There is no god which tsuririri.

to print a good which outweighs the evil and which is such that

Let's now look at premise (2). One way to object to an instance of (2) is even God could not have brought about the good without the evil. That's

the approach taken by the free will defense.

But that is not the only kind of objection one can make to premise (2) of

that there is not such a god, and hence have no particular reason to think know what good outweighs the evil, we have particular reason to think these arguments. One might also say that, despite the fact that we do not that (2) is true.