

the basic
idea

does free
will explain
any evil?

A large, solid orange circle with a subtle drop shadow, centered on a white background. Inside the circle, the text "does free will explain all evil?" is written in white, lowercase, sans-serif font, arranged in three lines.

does free
will explain
all evil?

“Traditional free-will approaches - with their move to shift responsibility and/or blame for evil away from God and onto personal creatures - are stalemated by horrendous evil. Human radical vulnerability to horrors cannot have its origin in misused created freedom, because - even if one accepted the story of Adam’s fall as historical (which I do not) - the way it is told, humans were radically vulnerable to horrors from the beginning, even in Eden. The framework within which the primal ancestors made their choices was such that obedient choices meant persistence of the status quo, while disobedient choices would result in the horrendous disarray such as humans have experienced ever since. Even if Adam’s and Eve’s choices are supposed to be somehow self-determined, the fact that the consequences amplify far beyond their capacity to conceive and hence to intend - viz., to horrors of which ex hypothesi they had no prior experience and of which they could therefore have no adequate conception - is not something for which humans are responsible. Rather it is a function of the interaction between human agency and the wider framework within which it is set, and God is responsible for creating human beings in such a framework!”

The reasoning given for rejecting premise (2) in the tsunami argument would not seem to apply here, because the fawn's suffering pre-dates any human choices.

Let's look at one last argument from particular evils. This focuses on especially horrific examples of human-caused evil.

These might include rape, torture, murder, or child abuse.

Presumably God has the power to prevent these. Let's concede that for God to prevent these would involve God limiting someone's free will (the free will of the person who perpetrated the act). Let's also concede that to take away this free choice would be to take away a good.

But is it really plausible that the good of that persons free choice outweighs the evil caused by the act?

The argument from Rowe's fawn

1. Some instance of pre-human animal suffering is an evil.
2. There is no good which outweighs this event and which is such that an omnipotent being could not have brought about the good without the tsunami.
3. A perfectly good being would eliminate every evil unless there was a good which outweighed that evil and it was impossible for that being to eliminate the evil without eliminating the good.
4. There is no omnipotent and perfectly good being. (1,2,3)
5. If there is no omnipotent and perfectly good being, God does not exist.

C. God does not exist. (4,5) suffering pre-dates any human choices.

The reasoning given for rejecting premise (2) in the tsumi argument would not seem to apply here, because the favn's

These might include rape, torture, murder, or child abuse.

focus on especially horrific examples of human-caused evil.

Let's look at one last argument from particular evils. This the act). Let's also concede that to take away this free choice

Presumably God has the power to prevent these. Let's concede someone's free will (the free will of the person who perpetrated

that for God to prevent these would involve God limiting

would be to take away a good.

But is it really plausible that the god of that person freely

outweighs the evil caused by the act?

the basic
idea

does free
will explain
any evil?

does free
will explain
all evil?

God. It can explain that, it seems, if we make the following assumption:

there could be evil in a world with a omnipotent and perfectly good

Summing up so far: we have seen that freewill promises to explain how

there are possible
situations which an omnipotent
being cannot bring about

we have
free will

free will is
a great good

the ability
to harm others
is a great good

Free will
cannot explain any evil.

Free will can explain some evil; but it can't explain all of the evil we find in the world.

does free
will explain
any evil?

suffering of this kind is evil.

Surely many events such as the current before human beings were on the scene; and surely at least some animal

This gives us the resources to construct a new argument:

argument would not seem to apply here.

The reasoning given for rejecting premise (2) in the tsumi

focus on especially horrific examples of human-caused evil.

Let's look at one last argument from particular evils. This

These might include rape, torture, murder, or child abuse.

the act). Let's also concede that to take away this free choice

Presumably God has the power to prevent these. Let's concede someone's free will (the free will of the person who perpetrated

would be to take away a good.

that for God to prevent these would involve God limiting

But is it really plausible that the god of that person free choice

outweighs the evil caused by the act?