

What is justice?

This question breaks down into a number of sub-questions. We can ask what it means for a person to be just. We can also ask what it means for an international system of distinct societies to be just.

Today we are going to focus on the question of what it means for an individual society — which for our purposes we can take to be a nation — to be just.

This question is sometimes called the question of distributive justice, because it asks about the just distribution of goods within a society at a time.

What goods are we talking about?

One category is what we might call material goods. These include things like food and property and income.

But these are not the only goods. Other goods include political rights (such as the right to vote) and liberties (such as the freedom to choose where one lives or whom one marries or what job one pursues). As we will see, there are others.

This is enough to describe a society which most of us would agree to be unjust.

At some initial time t , the members of a society are living in a state of relative equality. But at a later time $t+1$, some sub-group A takes all of the property of sub-group B. Group A consolidates its power, and enslaves the members of group B, depriving them by force of their political rights and liberties (such as freedom of association and the freedom to pursue an education). By time $t+2$, group A owns all of the property, and gives members of group B only the minimum needed for survival. Members of group B are only permitted to serve group A in the ways that members of group A direct.

It is universal that, at $t+2$, this is an unjust society.

The interesting question is: why is this? What would have to be different for this to be a just society? Different theories of justice provide different answers to this question.

Our first theory of justice provides a very straightforward answer to this question. On this view, what is unjust about our imagined society is its inequality. On this view, a just society is one in which goods are distributed equally. This view is called egalitarianism.

What would it mean for goods to be distributed equally? A simple answer would be that everyone gets exactly the same goods. Everyone gets just the same food, just the same kind of residence, etc.

But if you think about it, this wouldn't be an ideal set-up. Suppose that I love broccoli and hate spinach, and you are the reverse. Wouldn't it be better for me to get more broccoli and less spinach, and for you to get more spinach and less broccoli? And yet this would seem to be unjust on our simple egalitarian view.

The natural response to this on behalf of the egalitarian is to say that an equal distribution of goods need not mean that we each get exactly the same goods. Instead, perhaps we each should get exactly the same opportunity to buy goods. In a society like ours, this would mean that we would each get the same amount of money and the same income. I could then use this money on broccoli, and you could use it on spinach. The fact that we made different choices would not make the distribution of goods unequal.

A second problem for the egalitarian is the problem of how to handle inequalities that emerge over time.

Even if we specify that you and I get the same income at every period in our lives, we might still end up with very unequal distributions of goods. I might be very wasteful with my resources whereas you might be very clever with yours, so that after 20 years you have accumulated a large amount of resources. Or maybe my house was destroyed by a tornado, and yours was not.

It looks like, at the end of this 20 year period, we might have a very unequal distribution of resources. This leads to a dilemma for the egalitarian. Should we simply permit this kind of inequality, or should there be an occasional redistribution of resources to restore equality?

The problem is exacerbated if we think about families. Suppose that you are clever with your resources and want to pass them along to your children, whereas I give my children nothing. Then it looks like your children will have much greater resources than mine from the start. Obviously over a number of generations, the difference might become vast.

Here the same kind of dilemma arises. Do we simply permit these vast differences in resources, even from the beginning of one's life? That looks unjust, from an egalitarian perspective.

Or do we instead consistently redistribute wealth, for example by not allowing parents to pass along their resources to their children? Many see this as an unacceptable restriction on one's freedom.

The egalitarian seems forced to either permit inequalities which it was the purpose of the view to avoid or adopt very strong redistributive principles which restrict freedom in the use of one's resources.

This might convince you that the egalitarian's goal of securing equality of goods across people is not, in the end, viable. Let's look at an alternative theory, which is in some ways the opposite of egalitarianism. This is utilitarianism about justice: the view that the just society is the one which leads to the greatest total happiness.

This view might be motivated by considerations similar to those used to argue against egalitarianism. We all have an interest in living in a society in which there are inventions and innovations which make life better for everyone. So, we should aim to have a society which maximizes goods of this kind. And wouldn't that just be a society which has the maximum amount of pleasure, and the least pain?

an individual society → which for our purposes we can take to be a mean for an international system of distinct societies to be just.

This question breaks down into a number of sub-questions. We can nation — to be just.

Today we are going to focus on the question of what it means for ask what it means for a person to be just. We can also ask what it a society at a time.

This question is sometimes called the question of distributive justice, because it asks about the just distribution of goods within things like food and property and income.

One category is what we might call material goods. These include

But these are not the only goods. Other goods include political one pursues). As we will see, there are others.

freedom to choose where one lives or whom one marries or what job rights (such as the right to vote) and liberties (such as the

This is enough to describe a society which most of us would agree

to be unjust.

At some initial time t , the members of a society are living in a state of relative equality. But at a later time $t+1$, some sub-group A takes all of the property of sub-group B. Group A consolidates its power, and enslaves the members of group B, depriving them by force of their political rights and liberties (such as freedom of association and the freedom to pursue an education). By time $t+2$, group A owns all of the property, and gives members of group B only the minimum needed for survival. Members of group B are only permitted to serve group A in the ways that members of group A direct.

It is universal that, at $t+2$, this is an unjust society.

for this to be a just society? Different theories of justice provide different

The interesting question is: why is this? What would have to be different answers to this question.

distributed equally. This view is egalitarianism.

Our first theory of justice provides a very straightforward answer to this inequality. On this view, a just society is one in which goods are question. On this view, what is unjust about our imagined society is its answer would be that everyone gets exactly the same goods. Everyone get the same food, just the same kind of residence, etc.

What would it mean for goods to be distributed equally? A simple our simplest egalitarian view.

more spinach and less broccoli? And yet this would seem to be unjust on Love and hate spin each, and you are the reverse. Wouldn't it be

But if you think about it, this wouldn't be an ideal set-up. Suppose that better for me to get more brocoli and less spinach, and for you to get

The fact that we made different choices would not make the distribution an equal distribution of goods need not mean that we each get exactly could then use this money on broccoli, and you could use it on spinach.

opportunity to buy goods. In a society like ours, this would mean that we would each get the same amount of money and the same income.

The natural response to this on behalf of the egalitarian is to say that the same goods. Instead, perhaps we each should get exactly the same of goods unequal.

inequalities that emerge over time.

A second problem for the egalitarian is the problem of how to handle might be very wasteful with my resources where a might be very our lives, we might still end up with very unequal distribution of goods.

Even if we specify that you and I get the same income at every period in clever with yours, so that after 20 years you have accumulated large and yours was not.

amount of resources. Or maybe my house was destroyed by a tornado, egalitarian. Should we simply permit this kind of inequality, or should unequal distribution of resources. This leads to a dilemma for the

It's like, at the end of this 20 year period, we might have a very there a non-trivial distribution of resources to restore equality?

The problem is exacerbated if we think about families. Suppose that you vest.

are clever with your resources and want to pass them along to your children, whereas I give my children nothing. Then it looks like you Obviously over a number of generations, the difference might become children will have much greater res than mine from the start.

Here the same kind of dilemma arises. Do we simply permit the vast different resources, even from the beginning of one's life? That looks unjust, from egalitarian perspective.

allowing parents to pass along their values to their children? Many

Or do we instead consistently redistribute wealth, for example by not see this as an unacceptable restriction on one's freedom.

the purpose of the view to avoid or adopt every strong redistributive

The egalitarian seemed forced to either permit it in a quality which it was principles which restrict freedom in the use of one's resources.

leads to the greatest total happiness.

good as people is not, in the end, viable. Let's look at an alternative utilitarianism about justice: the view that the just society is the one which theory, which is in some ways the opposite of egalitarianism. This is

This might convince you that the egalitarian's goal of securing equality of we should aim to have a society which maximizes goods of this kind. And

This view might be motivated by considerations similar to those used to argue there are inventions and innovations which make life better for everyone. So, and the least pain?

wouldn't that just be a society which has the maximum amount of pleasure, against egalitarianism. We all have an interest in living in a society in which greatest happiness to the greatest number of people.

utilitarianism: the view that the just society is the one which provides the Really the version of galitarianism on which gods are constantly being likely to remove incentives to use one's goods productively. Suppose that you consider putting hardware into creating an invention which many people would simply be redistributed to ensure equality, wouldn't that make you redistributed so as to ensure equality. The utilitarian will point out that this is like y to do it?

would enjoy. If you knew that the money would earn from doing this