

What is justice?

This question breaks down into a number of sub-questions. We can ask what it means for a person to be just. We can also ask what it means for an international system of distinct societies to be just.

Today we are going to focus on the question of what it means for an individual society — which for our purposes we can take to be a nation — to be just.

This question is sometimes called the question of distributive justice, because it asks about the just distribution of goods within a society at a time.

What goods are we talking about?

One category is what we might call material goods. These include things like food and property and income.

But these are not the only goods. Other goods include political rights (such as the right to vote) and liberties (such as the freedom to choose where one lives or whom one marries or what job one pursues). As we will see, there are others.

This is enough to describe a society which most of us would agree to be unjust.

At some initial time t , the members of a society are living in a state of relative equality. But at a later time $t+1$, some sub-group A takes all of the property of sub-group B. Group A consolidates its power, and enslaves the members of group B, depriving them by force of their political rights and liberties (such as freedom of association and the freedom to pursue an education). By time $t+2$, group A owns all of the property, and gives members of group B only the minimum needed for survival. Members of group B are only permitted to serve group A in the ways that members of group A direct.

It is universal that, at $t+2$, this is an unjust society.

The interesting question is: why is this? What would have to be different for this to be a just society? Different theories of justice provide different answers to this question.

Our first theory of justice provides a very straightforward answer to this question. On this view, what is unjust about our imagined society is its inequality. On this view, a just society is one in which goods are distributed equally. This view is called egalitarianism.

What would it mean for goods to be distributed equally? A simple answer would be that everyone gets exactly the same goods. Everyone gets just the same food, just the same kind of residence, etc.

But if you think about it, this wouldn't be an ideal set-up. Suppose that I love broccoli and hate spinach, and you are the reverse. Wouldn't it be better for me to get more broccoli and less spinach, and for you to get more spinach and less broccoli? And yet this would seem to be unjust on our simple egalitarian view.

The natural response to this on behalf of the egalitarian is to say that an equal distribution of goods need not mean that we each get exactly the same goods. Instead, perhaps we each should get exactly the same opportunity to buy goods. In a society like ours, this would mean that we would each get the same amount of money and the same income. I could then use this money on broccoli, and you could use it on spinach. The fact that we made different choices would not make the distribution of goods unequal.

A second problem for the egalitarian is the problem of how to handle inequalities that emerge over time.

Even if we specify that you and I get the same income at every period in our lives, we might still end up with very unequal distributions of goods. I might be very wasteful with my resources whereas you might be very clever with yours, so that after 20 years you have accumulated a large amount of resources. Or maybe my house was destroyed by a tornado, and yours was not.

It looks like, at the end of this 20 year period, we might have a very unequal distribution of resources. This leads to a dilemma for the egalitarian. Should we simply permit this kind of inequality, or should there be an occasional redistribution of resources to restore equality?

The egalitarian seems forced to say that when inequalities in wealth and income develop, we must redistribute goods to regain the just situation in which all have the same wealth and income.

But this leads to two different objections. The first is that this is an unacceptable restriction on the freedom of individuals. Surely, some think, we should be free to accumulate goods which we can pass on to our children.

The second is that this policy would remove any incentives for individuals to do things — like creating inventions — which might both give them greater wealth and be to the benefit of all. In this way, egalitarianism might make everyone worse off than they would be if some inequalities were permitted.

This leads to a question for the egalitarian. How should we respond to situations in which inequalities in wealth and income develop over time?

Today we are going to focus on the question of what it means for

This question breaks down into a number of sub-questions. We can nation — to be just.

an individual society → which for our purposes we can take to be a mean for an international system of distinct societies to be just.

ask what it means for a person to be just. We can also ask what it

This question is sometimes called the question of distributive justice, because it asks about the just distribution of goods within a society at a time.

One category is what we might call material goods. These include things like food and property and income.

freedom to choose where one lives or whom one marries or what job one pursues). As we will see, there are others.

But these are not the only goods. Other goods include political rights (such as the right to vote) and liberties (such as the

This is enough to describe a society which most of us would agree

to be unjust.

At some initial time t , the members of a society are living in a state of relative equality. But at a later time $t+1$, some sub-group A takes all of the property of sub-group B. Group A consolidates its power, and enslaves the members of group B, depriving them by force of their political rights and liberties (such as freedom of association and the freedom to pursue an education). By time $t+2$, group A owns all of the property, and gives members of group B only the minimum needed for survival. Members of group B are only permitted to serve group A in the ways that members of group A direct.

It is universal that, at $t+2$, this is an unjust society.

The interesting question is: why is this? What would have to be different answers to this question.

for this to be a just society? Different theories of justice provide different question. On this view, what is unjust about our imagined society is its inequality. On this view, a just society is one in which goods are

Our first theory of justice provides a very straightforward answer to this distributed equally. This view is egalitarianism.

answer would be that everyone gets exactly the same goods. Everyone

What would it mean for goods to be distributed equally? A simple get the same food, just the same kind of residence, etc.

love and hate spin each, and you are the reverse. Wouldn't it be better for me to get more brocoli and less spinach, and for you to get

But if you think about it, this wouldn't be an ideal set-up. Suppose that more spinach and less broccoli? And yet this would seem to be unj our simplest egalitarian view.

The fact that we made different choices would not make the distribution an equal distribution of goods need not mean that we each get exactly

The natural response to this on behalf of the egalitarian is to say that of goods unequal.

opportunity to buy goods. In a society like ours, this would mean that could then use this money on broccoli, and you could use it on spinach.

the same goods. Instead, perhaps we each should get exactly the same we would each get the same amount of money and the same income.

inequalities that emerge over time.

A second problem for the egalitarian is the problem of how to handle our lives, we might still end up with very unequal distribution of goods.

might be very wasteful with my resources where a might be very amount of resources. Or maybe my house was destroyed by a tornado,

Even if we specify that you and I get the same income at every period in clever with yours, so that after 20 years you have accumulated large and yours was not.

egalitarian. Should we simply permit this kind of inequality, or should there a non-trivial distribution of resources to restore equality?

It's like, at the end of this 20 year period, we might have a very unequal distribution of resources. This leads to a dilemma for the

in which all have the same value and in me.

income develop, we must redistribute goods to regain the just situation

The egalitarian seem to say that when inequalities in wealth and

But this leads to two different objections. The first is that this is an think, we should be free to accumulate goods which we can pass on to our children.

unacceptable restriction on the freedom of individuals. Surely, some egalitarianism might make everyone worse off than they would be if give them greater wealth and to the benefit of all. In this way,

The second is that this policy would remove any incentive for sonme inequalities were permitted.

individuals to do things — like creating inventions — which might both

This leads to a question for the egalitarian. How should we respond to situations in which inequalities in wealth and income develop over time?

children, whereas I give my children nothing. Then it looks like you

The problem is exacerbated if we think about families. Suppose that you children will have much greater res than mine from the start.

Obviously over a number of generations, the difference might become vest.

are clever with your resources and want to pass them along to your different resources, even from the beginning of one's life? That looks unjust, from egalitarian perspective.

Here the same kind of dilemma arises. Do we simply permit the vast allowing parents to pass along their values to their children? Many see this as an unacceptable restriction on one's freedom.

Or do we instead consistently redistribute wealth, for example by not principles which restrict freedom in the use of one's resources.

the purpose of the view to avoid or adopt every strong redistributive

The egalitarian seemed forced to either permit it in a